Shikemichi District A-C-3

This district retains the feel from the 1600's and the old castle town of Nagoya that was planned under the Tokugawa reign. In the 1700's, storehouses were built over the eastern side of Shikemichi, and on the west, the merchants' row. Old houses and cellars still remain along with a nostalgic street fun to walk through. by 3

Nagoya City Archives A-F-2

The former local court buildings such as that of the old Nagoya Court of Appeals designated as important cultural properties have been preserved and visitors can have a look inside the building. It is the oldest Court of Appeals building in existence in Japan.

Nagoya TV Tower A-E-3

Standing 180 meters high, this was elected in 1954 as Japan's first multipurpose transmission tower. Observation decks at 90 and 100 meters above the ground afford panoramic views of Nagoya, and the after-dark vistas have even been designated part of the Night View Heritage of Japan. The tower underwent its first full renovation since it was built, and reopened in September 2020. Inside are cafes, restaurants, and merchandise shops, as well as a new hotel that takes full advantage of the structure design, giving the tower a second life as a new landmark in the city. The nighttime illumination is also not to be missed.
